Our clients recommend FastGSM for Unlocking and Hard Key Getting Samsung GALAXY Mini, the Samsung GALAXY MID and the.Q: What is faster: SELECT FROM table WHERE INT > 500 OR INT = 500? What is faster? SELECT * FROM table WHERE INT > 500 OR INT = 500; A: In general, the query optimizer will work backwards in selecting indexes and joins to find the smallest number of rows to satisfy the condition. In your case, the optimizer will end up doing this: (0) SELECT... WHERE (INT > 500) OR (INT = 500) Because INT = 500 is a null condition, the query optimizer will treat it the same as INT > 500. However, the optimizer will not realize that (INT > 500) OR (INT = 500) will get the same result as (INT > 500). Either way, the query will have to scan the table. Even though it would be better to optimize the query for int > 500, the optimizer will never do that. It will do the best thing it can with the information available. Which is the same: select all from table where there was a row that had int > 500. To optimize: SELECT * FROM table WHERE int > 500; Q: How to use client certificate to validate a RESTful Web Service? I have a requirement to develop an application that communicates with an existing legacy web service from one of my company's partners. I have no access to any developer documentation for that legacy service but do have a copy of the password protected client certificate that the client uses to authenticate with it. My colleague has told me that for security reasons the client certificate is only to be used by the client and not by anyone else. In other words, I need to use that client certificate to authenticate with this application, but I am not the client. (In fact, I have no idea if the client is even a third party or even an internal application.) Is there any way that I can do this using the OpenSSL tools? Ideally I'd like to avoid having to write my own authentication code for this. d0c515b9f4
